It would be a crime for PM Narendra Modi to be imprisoned by anyone other than the people who voted for him. As a citizen of India, I believe that Narendra Modi should remain in office, but with a different set of principles. And, to that end, I have two simple wishes: (1) that all those who demand that Modi be removed from office be made to serve a jail term, and (2) that all those in public life who helped him to become the Prime Minister of India are made to serve prison time. And if, say, a family has lost all their wealth in a business crash and has to sell their land to cover the losses, I would have no objection to that family being imprisoned for that which they have no power to prevent. Anyone in public life who has held a position of power ought to be made to show the same level of respect for the will of the people as they would have if they were serving a jail sentence. This includes an end to the funding of political parties by foreign parties. It is highly ironic that Modi, who has been elected on the basis of his being "clean," is himself accused of "filthy money". If anyone should be barred from holding public office, it is those who have been accused of "corruption" and are found guilty of that charge. If elected leaders are serving jail time for corruption, there will be no corruption. Sriram Parthasarathy served as Solicitor General of India. This is a post he has held since 2014. His appointment as the head of the Solicitor General's office has been controversial. At the time of his appointment, N. Ram, who had not been sanctioned by the Prime Minister's office, was appointed as the Solicitor General. Parthasarathy was made as an additional charge to that post. On his appointment, he was criticized by the Congress party for having, allegedly, benefited from a post-retirement job and also for joining a new political party. According to Parthasarathy, his appointment was based on the recommendation of "the top bureaucracy, the Supreme Court, the legal fraternity, constitutional experts, professional law firms, the media, and the large number of people who filled in forms on the Internet and expressed strong disapproval of my appointment." He also noted that he "had no desire to join the Congress party and
