When using the OOP paradigm in c#, is there a difference in the function and the method? I can't seem to find a clear cut answer. If it's different, then I need to find a more suitable term than method, and if the terminology is similar, I need to find a way to clearly describe the difference to the reader. Thank you A: A method is a type of a function with an explicit set of parameters. See: What is a method? A function is a single operation without explicit parameters.
