[^2]: See also [@chang_opinion_2017]. [^3]: [^4]: Note that the observed reason for the drop in participation could also be due to the allocation of resources, namely that either no Moodle class is held at the given time and a particular reason was assigned as a response, or there were no available instructors to teach this particular course. [^5]: The participation in our course slightly exceeded the average for Moodle classes (92% participation), which indicates that students are actually attending some of the Moodle classes. Is bronchial responsiveness to methacholine a useful diagnostic test for asthma? There is a tendency to use histamine challenge as the most specific diagnostic test for asthma, whereas the most sensitive diagnostic test, the measurement of bronchial responsiveness to methacholine, is often neglected. The present study addresses the value of this test for clinical purposes. The bronchial responsiveness to methacholine was studied in 404 patients, either in the clinic or during a control visit to the outpatient clinic, and compared with two other diagnostic tests: a) the measurement of bronchial responsiveness to histamine, and b) the evaluation of the clinical diagnosis of asthma. In patients in whom a suspected asthma was to be confirmed (n = 614), the bronchial responsiveness to histamine (PD<sub>20</sub> FEV<sub>1</sub>) ranged from 0.09 to 18.7 mg. The bronchial responsiveness to methacholine, defined as a 20% fall in FEV<sub>1</sub> 15 minutes after provocation with a cumulative dose of 10 mg, ranged from 0.05 to 7.2 mg. The estimated sensitivity and specificity of the 20% fall in FEV<sub>1</sub>, compared to the PD<sub>20</sub> to histamine, was 93 and 50
