Android Performance and memory leaks in buttons Hi I have a series of Buttons in my android application, all of these buttons at one point will have an onclick event. 1) The onclick event sets a static global boolean, if set true it loads a new activity and if false it does nothing. 2) Once the new activity is loaded, the application or the previous activity still has to call onPause for the original activity. 3) The new activity obviously uses a fair amount of memory and the task manager tells me the memory usage is 400mb, and this seems to increase over the course of the application as there will be an increase in number of activities used. Here is my question, when the application is built and installed does the android OS evict the apps out of memory? If I have a few hundred buttons each having an onclick event would I be safe to assume the OS will start killing apps and reduce the memory usage of the application? or would the application be better served by checking the boolean in the application and reusing the class object that is initially responsible for loading the new activity? Thanks, james A: There is a chance your application will be evicted and lose memory if your process is involved in a memory bug. There is a chance your app will not be evicted, but have it's own pool of memory instead. There is also a chance you will have no significant memory issues at all. I would recommend using the LeakCanary app to check for memory leaks and other issues in your app. This will tell you if your app is using too much memory and will give you some info on what classes are responsible for your memory usage. I would also suggest using the latest SDK tools to generate a heap dump of the application when it is exhibiting memory related problems and post the dump to StackOverflow for analysis.
