Magnetic recording is a key component of both enterprise and consumer HDDs. For example, magnetic recording media are used for data storage in hard disk drives for personal computers, as well as in embedded applications for hand-held devices, such as personal digital assistants (PDAs) and cellular phones. Magnetic recording media typically includes a data layer or medium where data is stored in the form of magnetic grains. To store data, the state of the magnetic grains must be made different from one another. This is accomplished by applying a magnetic field to the magnetic grains, and reversing the field such that the particles retain either the same state, or the opposite state. The data stored on the magnetic recording medium is organized in the form of concentric or spiral tracks on the medium. The tracks are divided into sectors, and a sector can be further divided into portions called fields. Each field is an individual pattern of the track data. To read the track data, the field data is used to determine the position of the track by reference to a map, and the corresponding sector data is read. This field data is often stored in the form of analog or digital data, which can be reconverted to the analog form for recording on the magnetic medium, or the analog data can be manipulated to correspond to the digital data. It is often desirable to minimize the error rate of the stored data. Referring now to FIG. 1A, data read from the media is typically amplified with a preamplifier (PA) circuit 10. The signal is then sensed or detected with a read head (RH) by a reader or read channel (RC) 12. A signal processor (SP) determines the digital data on the track by interpreting the fields contained in the RC data. To determine the data stored on the magnetic medium, the signal of the reader is received and converted to an electronic signal. A demodulator (DM) circuit demodulates the electronic signal to recover the analog or digital data on the magnetic medium. The demodulated data is then stored as the read back data. The read back data is then transferred to a host computer. In addition to the storage of data, the host computer has the additional tasks of writing data to
