Sleepy as a baby on a Saturday By Mai Yamaguchi, CNN Updated 2008-03-20 09:36:56 At first, it was only a twitch, but the baby cat's face remained unusually still. Hospital workers and doctors were puzzled: The cat wasn't sick and showed no sign of pain. Using a Doppler ultrasound probe, a nurse placed a rubber tube over the cat's chest. Its pulse quickened. The vital signs indicated that the cat had been severely injured and was in danger of losing her life. "If she didn't receive medication right away, her heart would stop," said Keiko Nagase, a certified cardiac technician at Kitasato University's Kitasato Institute Hospital in Japan. The doctor's first choice was to insert a needle into the cat's heart, but the cat refused. The cat, apparently aware of the procedure's possible consequences, cried as it was held down by a hospital worker. "We wanted to use the ultrasound. If you don't, it can be fatal," Nagase said. Nagase and her colleagues quickly inserted the ultrasound probe into the cat's chest and used the probe to stop its heart. After several minutes, the cat's pupils dilated and it fell asleep. A nurse delivered the first dose of catnip, a drug that counteracts the effects of anesthetic gases in the cat's system and helps reduce anxiety. The cat continued to sleep for four hours until it awoke and ate a bowl of cream. Now, with no stressful stimulus, the cat's heart rate and blood pressure returned to normal. "It was very sad, but a great
