the entire game; what the heck. I have only ever seen in 60 FPS in a very recent game, an FPS that was developed with my first generation console in mind. The PS2 had the choice of 60 FPS or 30 FPS. Most people chose 60 (at least on Windows) because, despite being a graphical downgrade, the 30 FPS was a better match for the game than 60 FPS. But when people migrated from consoles to PCs, 60 FPS was preferred over 30 FPS. There are plenty of technical reasons for this preference too, such as frame rate being the predominant factor in the appearance of motion blur, but the point is simply this: it was not right for the game to only be able to run at 60 FPS. This is one of many examples of an experience being designed for a specific platform and time, but it still being a perfectly good game and perfectly playable for most people. From a modern perspective, the PS3 and Xbox 360 are vastly superior consoles to the first generation of consoles. But this is the case with most technology, because when technology first starts, it is almost always limited by its design. As the next generation arrives, we take the current generation and push it further and further. Even between generations, we don't consider the older one to be obsolete; in fact, the older games are most often going to be more popular, because as people move from one generation to the next, the older generations become less and less popular. The same is true with old technology. Not only is new technology not deemed obsolete, but in fact, we (at least in North America) often use it to make older technology better. The PlayStation 3 is vastly superior to the original PlayStation and Xbox, which are also vastly superior to their predecessors. The point I'm trying to make here is that regardless of your personal preference, there will be people that play a game on a particular system, and people that play a game on that system. And what happens is that most of the time, people that play the game on that system find it more enjoyable. The people that play it on a newer system don't find it as enjoyable as the ones that play it on the older system. This is why when a game is remastered to run on a newer console, it often gets a worse score than a game that was designed to run on a similar console but is now remastered. This is very simple; it's basic logic. If

Q: AngularJS calling jQuery function from AngularJS does not affect HTML when the function is called? I'm trying to use AngularJS to implement part of my web application. I'm trying to add a simple JQuery function to the DOM with a button click and have AngularJS react to that. This is the current HTML: Alert And this is the current JS: 'use strict'; angular.module('myApp', []); angular.module('myApp') .controller('MainCtrl', MainCtrl); MainCtrl.$inject = ['$scope']; function MainCtrl($scope) { $scope.alertTest = alertTest; function alertTest() { alert('hello'); } } Unfortunately, the alert only shows if I check my JS console, when I click the button, the page just reloads as if AngularJS never loaded. Why is this? Also, how can I get the alert to show up? A: Your code looks fine. The only things I'd change is to call your javascript file in the head (right before the closing body tag) You might also consider using a controller for your jquery like so function MainCtrl($scope,$http) { //your rest of the code The jquery would be outside of the controllers scope. That way $scope.alertTest will be the global scope. Hope that helps.
